J L WILSON

Jane Austin--college professor and romance novelist (and no relation to the Jane Austen), just had her first book reviewed by D. Fitzgerald Williams, a professor at nearby Derby College. His condescending tone and dismissive critique irk Jane, but it's Fitz's support of a nearby construction project that really annoys her. That project will destroy a fragile ecosystem and Jane is determined to stop it.

Then Jane's neighbor, Mr. Collins, is murdered and the documents he leaves for Jane might stop the construction before it starts. Fitz gets involved in the legal evaluation of those documents, showing Jane a new side to this complex and interesting man.

But as their romance starts to blossom, Jane uncovers the truth about Mr. Collins and the land used for the construction. She realizes that Fitz might not be all that he appears to be. The big question, though is this: is he the hero or the villain of her romance?

It might cost her life to find out.
